

I strongly oppose the reinstatement of aerial gunning of bears in Alaska. Targeting these animals—especially mothers with cubs—from the air is not only inhumane, but also unjustifiable given the lack of scientific evidence that it benefits caribou populations.

This practice is a devastating example of violence against wildlife under the guise of management. As someone who values the interconnectedness of ecosystems and the sacredness of all life, I believe we must find better, more ethical solutions rooted in science and compassion.

Every life matters—this kind of slaughter has no place in modern conservation.
